The conviction of Victor Berge at Gironde

a s'zes for the murder of an unmarried woman with whom he was living discloses one of the most curlous proofs that facts are stranger than fic ion that has been brought to public attention for a long time. Victor was the son of a small landed proprietor, 13siding just outside of Capons, Dapartment of Lot. Vistor was receiving a medical edu cation, the nearest medical school being Bordesux. The time came when Victor, who was of an affectionate disposition, began to loose a little of his pristine enthuslaem for his studies, and to long for the comforts of home life. Not long before Vic-ter had solved the problem of how to prosecute his studies under more domestic surroundings in a manner common to French students. He met at public balls a fascinating creature, Marie Boudon, a grisette It was not long before the two became intimate. Marie, besides being pretty, pert and long-headed, was a young lady with a kesn eye to the main chance, who, although she consented to a temporary lisison with the young student, firmly intended to become his wife when he finished his studies and be-

Marie was more firmly impressed with the wisdom of her decision from the fact that Victor was the beloved nephew of several maiden aunts, each of whom had song sums. Three years passed; Victor was looking for-ward to receiving his degree and establishing himself at Cahore, when he was suddenly called home by the alarming illness of Mile. Potet, one of his aunts. He only arrived in time to close the eyes of his favorite relative and attend her funeral. This over he returned to Bordeaux, taking with him the old lady's will, which made him the sole owner of 40,000 francs. In France this was a good start in life for a penniless youth. Although the young people had been thus intimate, Victor had not been clever enough to fathom the depth of the character of his "chere sime," who had known how to conceal from him the many months, attended him in sickness deprive her of what was clearly her right, the was fully determined that he should never enjoy a sou's worth of his good for Saiting the action to the word, she made a grab at the will lying on a table, and succeeded in getting hold of it. Victor, fearing treachery, tried to snatch it from her. There was a rough and tumble tussle. Before Vic tor realized what had happened, poor Marie was thrown violently against the table, but not, however, before she had swallowed the will. Stunged into unconsciousness, she never opened her eyes again, but died soon af er from concussion of the brain. Horrified at the result of their quarrel, and fear ful of discovery, Victor, packing some of his possessions in a bag, went out, locking the door and taking the key. Dezed, only half conscious of his action, and frenzied by this double calamity, be finally decided to return to the room. It was then about the middle of the night, Marie baving been dead for several hours. Victor wished to see wheth-er the will could not be recovered by cutting open her stomach. This is how the body of the poor girl came to be found mutilated. Berge confessed the crime. While his story was not entirely credited, although strengthened by researches of the police, it was tuf-ficiently believed to obtain for him a sentence of hard labor for life instead of the

SEIZED A EURGLAR .- Miss Susie Hubbard, a young woman of Dunnellen, N. J., is the beroine in a plucky eccounter with a borglar, who entered her father's house Sunday night. The intruder forced an entrance to several other houses before he broke into John Hubbard's big mansion and obtained considerable jewelry and money. Miss Hubbard was awakened as the man was leaving her room, after rifling it of its contents. She sprang at him and caught his coat tail, just as he shut the door in her face. She screamed so loudly for help that the robber leaped out of a window, leaving his cost in Miss Hubbard's grasp.
